eDiscovery and Beyond - an overview

The eDiscovery & Beyond Summit concluded last week marking eleven years that Chilli IQ has been bringing insights of information governance and eDiscovery to a keen Australian audience. A lot has changed over the years and so has the format of the event which proved a fresh change and a jam-packed day of insights and news.

The event kicked off with a brief overview of the current legal landscape, masterly presented by the Chair of the day Michael do Rozario from Corrs who also did a brilliant job in keeping everyone on time and directing questions.

Setting the local and Asian scene was Andrew Caspersonn the opening speaker who presented everything from the background and general environment of the Asian market to the regulatory and language issues that one might face. From Asian markets to international financial investigations presented by FTI Consulting's Emily Tice via skype. All aspects of data and data analytics were expertly discussed in view of recent case studies that the FTI team have been working on. An insightful overview on the importance of data analytics in big cases, was a main focus.

It is was a privilege to have Australia's leading Judicial expert, Justice Peter Vickery speak on the first case of the use of TAR: The McConnell Dowell Constructors v Santam Ltd that he had worked on. The Justice's presentation was an excellent sum up of the practical use of TAR and its future implications in the courts. Peter Wood from MinterEllison followed on with a great analysis of the use of technology assisted review and its use in big cases in the courts. His expertise in this area, especially in discovery in construction cases and discovery in general, offered practical considerations for a practitioner using TAR and food for thought in future cases.

The opportunity to ask questions and hear from the experts is another reason that delegates continue to attend the eDiscovery Summit. This year the main panel discussion covered the future of law and how proportionality and defensibility takes more than technology. In the arm chair discussion were: Gavin Wingfield from KWM, Lisa Kozaris from Allens and Maureen Duffy from Sibenco. All the main topics of TAR, CAL and AI were discussed together with analytics and technical solutions to receive defensible discovery outcomes. It was an hour of intense discussion and an opportunity for open discourse from the floor.

The new format of the event meant that the first streamed sessions occurred; in one room Skye Wu from Telstra discussed CyberSecurity and Sanjay Verma from Terra Firma talked about Cyber Risk, in the other. Skye dazzled the room with stories of data breaches and at times humorous cyber security risks and how they were discovered by advanced security analytics. The hidden knowledge in company data was one of the highlights of the presentation. Sanjay is a veteran of cybersecurity and his 22 years in the field come with a number of good stories to tell. His session on cyber risk - a balancing act, deliberated the issue of where to start, how much to spend and how long is the piece of string - was on point. He concluded with a fascinating overview on how organisations are taking a pragmatic and scalable approach to deal with cyber threats.

The last session of the day and what is classed as the 'graveyard shift' was brought to life by James Turner from IBRS. His indepth analysis of the foreseeable business risk that comes with doing business online was insightful. He discussed the way cybersecurity can empower executives through the IBRS security leadership map which is designed to help both the security practitioners and IT executives. It was an exceptional way to end what was an informative and practical day.

The eleventh and new look eDiscovery & Beyond Summit concluded to what one of the delegates proclaimed:

“Valuable event, exceptional speakers and very well run conference.”
Legal Technology Manager - Jackson Macdonald

The event prides itself on exceptional speakers to learn and be up to date on current issues, opportunities to mingle and network with your peers and the occasion to wander through the latest solution provider companies that exhibit at the event. We are indebted to the constant support of our sponsors and speakers and advisory panel who make the whole event possible.

Till next year !
